"Talking Books" and Special Type Featured at Sight-Saving Class

Special children are lucky children if they live in the Torrance Southwest School District. A visit to Mrs. Betty Hardesty's sight-saving class at North High shows why.

Typewriters with large-size type and "talking books" are all proudly displayed by Mrs. Hardesty's pupils. Especially eager to show off a little at the typewriter, the students are aware of their handicaps but happy to show how they compensate for them.

The class is made up of seven students at present that have problems with poor vision. Though legal requirement to enter the class is 20/70 vision without glasses most of the students have closer to 20/200 vision.

Designed to help the pupils with their subjects the class is more like a home room than anything else. "There is a noticeable amount of team spirit about, but other classes are just as important.

The students take part in as many of the normal school activities as possible in as many of the normal school activities as possible and come to Mrs. Hardesty for only one period a day of special tutoring. She may read their lessons to them or type up their spelling words in large-size print for them to read more easily.

To a few students, Mrs. Hardesty teaches Braille if this is recommended by the doctor. When tests are given in other classes, they may be brought to Mrs. Hardesty, who reads the questions.

In most cases, the students vision probably will never get much worse, but, of course, there are a few whose eyesight is deteriorating. The extra help in learning to use their ears better helps Mrs. Hardesty's pupils adapt to their vision problems.

In many cases other students are not even aware of the fact that these pupils are different. Usually they sit in the front row but beyond that they take part in other classes with no special treatment.

All individuals, some will go on to college while others will provide the youngsters with the well rounded school life, so impossible without Mrs. Hardesty's homeroom!
